

Eleven years after the last film, Wes Craven returns to guide us down a series of blind, bloody alleys in the fourth (and let's hope final) instalment of the horror/comedy franchise. Well-made and with a number of relatively amusing scenes, it is actually quite enjoyable, albeit with no great revelations, surprises or significant inventiveness. Better than Scream 3, but then that's not really saying much.

